Minority governments another sign that Canada is in the midst of a political upheaval

Canadians can't seem to make up their minds lately, with more minority governments in power across the country than ever before - and another one potentially on its way in October's federal election. It's partly the result of people moving away from their traditional voting patterns and being increasingly open to new options. It's a trend more than a few candidates are counting on this fall. Establishment parties are struggling around the globe. In recent elections to the European Parliament - the largest democratic exercise in the world after India's elections - the two groupings of parties that always have held sway just their combined majority for the first time. That anti-establishment vote splintered in different directions. Far-right populists, Greens and pro-EU liberals all made gains at the expense of the centre-right European People's Party and the centre-left Socialists & Democrats. In the United Kingdom, one recent poll gave no party over a quarter of the vote. Labour and the Conservatives, the only two parties that have governed the country since the end of the First World War, were tied for third behind the Liberal Democrats and Nigel Farage's upstart Brexit Party, which just finished first in the U.K. in those European elections. More minority governments than ever before. Provincial legislatures in Canada are also looking more kaleidoscopic. Breakthroughs by the Greens led to minority governments in British Columbia in 2017 and in Prince Edward Island earlier this year. In New Brunswick, the Greens were joined by the populist People's Alliance in contributing to a hung legislature in 2018. In Newfoundland and Labrador, wins by two Independents and three candidates for the NDP - a party that has never formed government in the province - helped reduce the incumbent Liberals to just 20 seats in the 40-seat House of Assembly. That makes four minority governments across the country, more than have ever existed in Canada's provinces at the same time. It surpasses the record of three minority provincial governments that was set just three times in the past: in 1920-22, 1943-45 and 1971-72. Judging by national polls, Canadians appear prepared to prevent any party from securing a majority government in October's federal election as well. Votes for non-traditional parties hit a new high. According to the CBC's Canada Poll Tracker, an aggregation of all publicly available polling data, nearly 14 per cent of Canadians are prepared to vote for parties or candidates that have never formed either a government or an Official Opposition. If that trend holds in the October vote, it would result in the lowest combined score for the Liberals, Conservatives, New Democrats and Bloc Québécois (and their predecessor parties) since 1945. Most of that vote is currently going to the Greens, who stand at just under 10 per cent in the polls. The rest is split between the People's Party, other small parties and Independent candidates. Two Independent candidates in particular have contributed to the fall in support for one of the establishment parties. It was after the SNC-Lavalin affair, and the subsequent caucus departures of Jody Wilson-Raybould and Jane Philpott, that the Liberals saw their support plummet. The two former cabinet ministers announced this week they'd run as Independents, calling for a movement of more "independent parliamentarians" across the country. That isn't a new idea, by the way. It echoes the movement that caused Canada's first period of minority rule. Voting for something different. After the catalysis of the First World War, the state of politics around the world was in flux. That phenomenon extended to Canada, where new parties began to win seats and form governments across the country. Most successful were the Progressives and Farmers' parties. The United Farmers of Ontario stormed to power in 1919 with a minority government, propped up by Labour members who themselves made their first breakthrough. The next year, Premier and Labour candidates made inroads in provincial elections in Manitoba and New Brunswick, resulting in minority governments in those two provinces as well. The United Farmers secured a majority government in Alberta in 1921. The federal expression of this movement, the Progressive Party, finished second in the 1921 election, resulting in the country's first minority government. But the Progressives didn't see themselves as a traditional party and declined the opportunity to form the Official Opposition. The party believed in freeing their MPs from the overbearing control of a centralized leadership - a view that was shared by the Farmers' parties at the provincial level. The problem with this approach soon became clear, as a lack of unity made it difficult to hold the parties together. The United Farmers of Ontario went down to defeat in 1923 and the federal Progressive Party was splintered and significantly reduced by 1925, disintegrating into irrelevance by the 1930s. The next series of minority governments also coincided with a time when voters were coming unglued from their old voting habits. In the midst of the Second World War (armed conflicts have a tendency to shake up domestic politics) the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (the CCF, forerunner of the NDP) surged in the polls. In 1943, a Gallup survey had the CCF narrowly ahead in a three-way national race, following provincial breakthroughs in B.C. and Manitoba in 1941 that prevented any party from winning a majority. The Ontario CCF made a significant

Bank of Canada set to keep rates on hold today - and won't hike until at least after the election

Most analysts predict rates won't rise again until next year at the earliest. Bank of Canada Governor Stephen Poloz will probably keep interest rates unchanged Wednesday in what looks to be a prolonged hiatus, at least until after elections in October. All 25 analysts surveyed by Bloomberg see policy makers leaving the benchmark overnight rate at 1.75 per cent in a decision at 10 a.m. in Ottawa. That would mark a fifth straight hold by the central bank since it last raised borrowing costs in October. Longer-term, most analysts predict rates won't rise again until next year at the earliest. It's a reflection of an economy, only just emerging from a serious slowdown, that's still too fragile to cope with higher rates. Businesses are spooked by global trade uncertainty. Low oil prices and transportation constraints have hobbled the crucial energy sector. Record debt levels are adding weight on consumer spending. Policy makers don't even know for sure how low the rate increases - five since mid-2017 - are affecting households. "Markets are more gloomy about our economy than the Bank of Canada - who's right?"

Bank of Canada does not raise rates until end of 2020, with 40% chance of cut, poll says. "Poloz sees higher interest rates on the horizon once economy exits current soft patch. Investors, more pessimistic than analysts, are betting on cuts rather than hikes. They see an 80 per cent chance of a rate cut over the next 12 months. In the U.S., conviction on lower rates is even stronger, with at least two rate cuts priced in over that period. Still, the Bank of Canada has shown no inclination to loosen policy. For one, officials are wary of encouraging more borrowing in an economy already saddled with debt. Underlying price pressures, meanwhile, have been hovering around the 2 per cent target for more than a year. As recently as last week, Poloz continued to argue for the long-term need for higher rates. There are also federal elections. While the central bank in the past has adjusted rates in the months leading up to a general vote, policy makers would need to consider the political optics of any move - either up or down. That makes the task likely a change. The most likely reason for the Bank of Canada to be pulled off the sidelines before the October election would be an adverse global economic or financial event. This could take the form of an escalating trade war between the U.S. and China, a correction in global financial markets, a cut in rates by the Federal Reserve or a combination of these. Outside of global developments, there aren't any obvious made-in-Canada triggers for Poloz to move in the next six months.

Canada invests $300 million in fund supporting women's equality

She adds Ottawa has also pledged to match donations for domestic programs of up to $10 million each for three groups - Community Foundations of Canada, the Canadian Women's Foundation and Grand Challenges Canada.

VANCOUVER - Canada's minister of gender equality has announced a new initiative aimed at transforming how women's rights organizations are supported in developing countries and at home.

Canada calls new tariffs a 'bilateral' border issue between U.S. and Mexico

OTTAWA - The Canadian government is downplaying the latest escalation in U.S.-Mexico relations, calling U.S. President Donald Trump's threat of 5 per cent tariffs on all Mexican imports a "bilateral" border dispute that won't stall the newly renegotiated three-way free trade pact.

The new U.S. action to impose punishing escalating tariffs on Mexican imports to force a crackdown on illegal immigration and drug smuggling could potentially derail ratification of the new NAFTA, although Mexico and Canada moved swiftly Friday to dial down the temperature and react with calm public reassurances.

Foreign Affairs Minister Chrystia Freeland brushed off the dispute as "a bilateral issue," just as beads over the northern border with Canada would be a bilateral Canada-U.S. matter, she said.

But Freeland injected a note of caution in her statements: "Our intention is insofar as possible to move in tandem with our partners," to ratify the new NAFTA, she told reporters.

Mexican President Andrés Manuel López Obrador told a daily news conference that the tariff threat "does not stop the process that

W. Freeland directly addressed whether Trump's latest action provokes the U.S. could still slip tariffs on Canadian products.

The Trump administration is still considering whether to levy tariffs on uranium imports under the same obscure national security provision it once cited to protect steel and aluminum. American domestic producers want quotas to protect a quarter of the U.S. uranium market for themselves. Canada only won the lifting of the steel and aluminum tariffs two weeks ago.

Trade ministers, standing next to Pence on Thursday, appeared to gird himself for another battle, stressing that "Canada is a stable and reliable source of uranium for American civil nuclear reactors. Maintaining access is good for Canada and the U.S. alike."

Canada is one of the top global producers of uranium, and exports 85 per cent of its uranium products to the United States, European Union.

The Conservatives and New Democrats are critical of the move to ratify the new NAFTA, saying there is no rush. The NDP hopes for more progressive changes, while Conservatives say the Liberal government gave up too much in the deal.

They claim the legislation to approve it inserted a clause that recognizes the deal could still change even after it is approved by Parliament - saying their refusal Friday, against the facts were wrong.

Equality Fund. She says it brings together 11 organizations from the philanthropic, non-profit and financial sectors, including the Canada-based March International Women's Fund, the African Women's Development Fund and Oxfam Canada in hopes of creating a perpetual and sustainable mechanism for funding gender equality.

Monsef says Ottawa has also pledged to match donations for domestic programs of up to $10 million each for three groups - Community Foundations of Canada, the Canadian Women's Foundation and Grand Challenges Canada.

Global Affairs says in a release $100 million has already been raised, on top of the federal government's contribution, with an aim to reach $1 billion over the next 15 years.

Monsef is in Vancouver this week to attend the Women Deliver conference, which the Global Affairs Department expects will draw 9,000 officials and advocates for gender equality from around the world.

Nor did Freeland directly address whether Trump's latest action provokes the U.S. could still slip tariffs on Canadian products.

Liberal government expanding program to protect foreign workers in Canada from exploitation

The Liberal government is expanding a program to allow foreign workers who've been exploited or abused in Canada to get out from under their employer's control.

Most foreign nationals here temporarily working at low-wage jobs on farms and in the service sector are bound by law to work only for one employer. That has put many at the mercy of bosses who take advantage of their lack of options by underpaying them or making them put up with intolerable working or living conditions.

Starting next week, temporary foreign workers who find themselves in abusive job situations will be able to apply for open work permits that will allow them to find other jobs in Canada. This will expand a pilot project that started in British Columbia in 2016 and has granted 51 such permits up to November of last year.

The move follows a Globe and Mail investigation - published in April - that revealed how 45 recruiters and consultants stood accused of exploiting more than 2,000 foreign nationals in Canada in recent years for their money, their labour, or both.

Investigation: How foreign workers fall prey to a sprawling web of labour trafficking in Canada

"No worker should fear losing their job when they are being recruited in their place of work," Immigration Minister Ahmed Hussein said in a media release. "Today, we say, fear no more."

While migrant-worker advocates applauded that, many still believe the new program won't stop the abuse. The FCI Refugee Centre in Toronto is one of scores of agencies that have been calling on the government for years to allow temporary workers to seek jobs with any employer, at least in a particular sector, as soon as they arrive.

"There are systemic issues that keep the system in a vicious circle and keep making these things happen."

We recognize the good intentions here by the government, but it is not enough," said Luis Alberto Mata, who handles human-trafficking cases at the Refugee Centre.

Mr. Mata pointed out that workers must still endure abuse before they can even apply for a new open work permit. They also have to find their way to an advocacy organization to help them build their case because foreign nationals can only apply for the new permits through designated agencies.

"We are sad and we are worried to see that once again, the [immigration] officer is going to have the final decision. The worker has to prove the abuses," Mr. Mata said.

Immigration, Refugees and

Citizenship Canada has estimated about 500 abused workers will apply for the new permits each year across the country.

Manuel Burgos came to Canada from Honduras five years ago; he said he worked under intolerable conditions for the first three at a farm in Ontario.

He is claiming refugee status because he said his brother was killed in Honduras over a debt Mr. Burgos owes to the recruiter in his home country who got him into Canada.

But he now has an open work permit and a good job working in construction.

"My work is way better now," Mr. Burgos said. "It's better pay, I don't feel that pressure - because I have the open work permit, I am free and I have choice. I can change the job when I want."

NDP immigration critic Jenny Kwan said she would like to see the government go even further than open work permits for all, and consider giving permanent residency to anyone who qualifies to come to Canada for a job.

"If you are good enough to work, you are good enough to stay," said Ms. Kwan, who pointed out many workers come and go, working at menial jobs for years, while trying to wait for a foothold to stay.

"The Temporary Foreign Worker Program was brought in once upon a time for workers who were truly temporary and had no intention of staying in Canada," she said.

"What's lacking is the solid legal safeguards to the extent that our government is committed to addressing data protection going forward," she said.

McPhail said the Civic Data Trust and data mobility are useful, but not effective substitutes for law.

"Giving people more control over their data is something the Digital Charter promised, and is a part of how we control our private information, but it's not efficient as a privacy protection," she said.

Data mobility, the right to transfer one's data from one company or organization to another, is proposed under the charter, aligning Canada with the European Union's General Data Protection Regulation.

Despite the criticism, a majority of Torontonians remain in favour of Sidewalk Labs. A poll from Toronto Region Board of Trade (TRBT) released last week showed 54% of those polled were in support of Sidewalk Toronto, and a poll from February also commissioned by the TRBT showed 55% approved of Sidewalk Labs.

Canada's Digital Charter not strong enough to soothe privacy concerns on Sidewalk Labs: critics Canada's Digital Charter lacks sufficient legal enforcement power to effectively protect privacy and regulate use of personal data, according to critics worried that a smart city project in Toronto by Alphabet's Sidewalk Labs unit could be misused for surveillance.

The Digital Charter was announced this month to guide Canada on data and the digital economy, and mentions concerns about smart cities.

Sidewalk Toronto is a data-driven urban development project that Sidewalk Labs is doing on the city's waterfront. It uses sensors in public areas that detect energy use, traffic, and pollution. Critics say it lacks sufficient privacy controls.

The Digital Charter "is intended to provide comfort to citizens of Canada regarding privacy, but it's talk," said Ann Cavoukian, former information and privacy commissioner of Ontario.

Cavoukian resigned from her position as a privacy advisor for Sidewalk Labs last year after the project did not guarantee anonymity with a provision to let people remove their identity from a publicly viewable database called the Civic Data Trust.

"That would mean personally identified data would be the end of privacy," Cavoukian said.

Sidewalk Labs spokeswoman Keerthana Rang said in an email to Reuters that the project was pleased to see the Digital Charter provide for creation of data trusts and would keep working on the issue with Waterfront Toronto and the federal government.

She said Sidewalk Labs was committed to allowing anonymity but could not compel other companies and individuals to comply. Rang said Sidewalk Labs will submit a proposal for Waterfront Toronto in June.

Sidewalk Labs CEO Dan Decteroff said in a talk at last week's Collision Conference that the project could open the first buildings in 2023. Rang said the 2023 date is possible, but they are focusing on the June proposal and public consultations currently.

Brenda McPhail, director of the privacy, technology, and surveillance project of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, said the Digital Charter does not go far enough to protect citizens against potential abuses of data.
